Based on Flimsy Research

When the family is in order, all the social relationships of mankind shall be in order.
- I Ching

I've watched shows like Dr. Phil where a seven-year-old is hitting and cursing at his parents and find myself wondering...how did it get that bad? It couldn't have started out that way? Do we hope for parenting advice that at best is based on flimsy research?

Like a pull in a scarf, any problem left unresolved can unravel. As parents we face little problems on a daily basis. We have to pay attention and resolve the little problems before they get worse and overwhelm us.

That is where Parental Wisdom® comes in. In the past, parents lived in a sort of village, seeking advice from family and friends. Today's families live further apart and deal with more complex societal issues. Parents turn to experts, but the idea of a one-size-fit all solution to parenting problems just doesn't work if we really believe we are unique.

The traditional method of turning to family and friend for parenting advice presents a different set of problems:

- Has that person had experience with that particular situation? After all, our moms didn't raise us in the same media and marketing intense world.
- If someone offers you advice and you don't agree, now what?
- Do you have to 'report' back to them?
- And most importantly, as your child's advocate, what if your child does something you simply don't want to share? Then where do you turn?

To understand Parental Wisdom imagine a place where you could ask all your parenting questions, and where you, the real expert in knowing your child best, are given multiple opinions from trusted, credible sources so you can choose which advice works best for your unique child and situation.

Imagine that you can be anonymous and this unique service is free.

You have a good imagination.

Parental Wisdom is so unique, it's patented.

Once a parent, always a parent.

Questions start before the first baby arrives and continue well past grandchildren.

Here is an idea of some of the questions our nearly 100 expert advisors respond to:

- My 18- year old son who is a high school graduate shows no responsibility....
- I know baby's cry a lot, but our newborn (6 day old) baby has cried through the night and all morning...
- I have two boys that share a bedroom, closet, bunk beds, and toys. They are ages 7 and 8. When its time to clean their room, they begin arguing that they've cleaned up their mess but the rest is their brother's mess...
- My nine-year-old is having problems with our next door neighbor's daughter. There is a lot of nasty name calling and sometimes it gets physical...
- I have been divorced for almost 2 years and have joint/legal custody of my 4 ½ year-old daughter, while I am the primary parent of residence, our divorce decree states that we are to make medical, religion and school decisions together, however...
- My 13- year old daughter has a boyfriend that I don't like. I want to forbid her to see him but I'm afraid she will date him at school behind my back....
- My 15-yr old daughter was caught cheating with her cell phone on a physics test...
- At what age would you allow a child to have a Facebook?
- I have an 8 yr. old son who was badly bullied in kindergarten and till this day, he still feels uncomfortable in school even though it is a different and much better school...

Where do you turn to find answers?
